Oronoka restaurant owner dead at 76

By John Ripley
Of the NEWS Staff

ORONO — S. John Kobritz, the Oronoka restaurant owner who heaped food upon his beloved patrons and headaches upon his detractors, died Saturday. He was 76.

Kobritz died of a heart attack after work early Saturday; services were held Sunday.

Born in Bangor on Dec. 14, 1916, Kobritz graduated from Bangor High School and served in the U.S. Army during World War II. As co-owner of Star Beef Co. with his brother, Nathan, Kobritz acquired the Oronoka in 1954.

With many of those who knew Kobritz, there was no middle ground — he was either a white-lad fatherly figure who would greet customers with a flour-caked hand and mounds of extra food, or a cantankerous burr who kept the town engaged in lengthy legal battles over health complaints at the restaurant.

It didn't take long for the Oronoka to become a popular hangout for students, many of whom would send their children there a generation later.

While records show that the Oronoka gathered a thick file of state and local health violations, Kobritz was always quick to point out there were never reports of anyone ever getting sick from eating at the restaurant. He also turned to his legions of supporters, from college students away from home for the first time to airline personnel who made the Oronoka a habit during stopovers in Bangor. Even his critics acknowledged that Kobritz was able to persevere by being tenacious and by hiring clever attorneys, whom he went through like a side of beef placed before a University of Maine hockey team. When the Internal Revenue Service moved in against the Oronoka for failing to pay $20,000 in back taxes four years ago, Kobritz and his attorneys maneuvered so that, while the IRS claimed the deed, Kobritz kept control of the operation.

Although various state and local agencies complained about cats in the kitchen, lukewarm dishwater, or junk cars out in the yard, the doors to the Oronoka rarely closed, and the popular spot continued to attract new generations of students. As the town worked to get him to remove the cars, Kobritz once said he hired needy persons to renovate them, which, in turn, he argued, provided taxes to the town.

Other than the code and health violations, the history between Kobritz and the town was long and colorful.

When relations between state or local inspectors soured, Kobritz simply refused to let them inside the Oronoka, adding them to his list of officials who had a "vendetta" against him.

Kobritz also was famous in the town office for another habit: Whether by wit or whim, he would pay his taxes at the last minute — sometimes literally — and often in small bills crammed into a paper sack.

Richard Emerick, a friend of Kobritz for 30 years, recalled that after Emerick's mother passed away

he found Kobritz on the steps of his home, sweet rolls and fresh loaves of bread in hand.

"If I had a kid here who was a student, I can't think of any other place I'd want them to go than the Oronoka," Emerick said. "Some people, when they leave a community, they leave a void. John's one of those people."

Holocaust service held in Bangor

One woman's story makes real the sorrow of the Holocaust

Holocaust, from A1
in Nova Scotia. She married the young man who had waited for her so long, and they had Evelyn and her twin brother.

"My mother loved this country she looked on as her own," Trotzky said as she shared slides of the black-and-white pictures of her beautiful young mother. Trotzky never knew her grandparents. They had been taken to the concentration camp at Dachau, as had Alzbeta's twin sisters. None of them survived.

Bangor has a number of Holocaust survivors, among them Celia Segal, who with Beth Israel President Norman Minsky lit the candles. Each of the six candles represented 1 million Jews who died. Scott Rapaport sang the "El Malei Rahamim" in their memory, and prayers were recited by Rabbi Joseph Schonberger.

His wife, Susan Schonberger, also shared a story, that of a young Hungarian boy with a passion for languages. Years later, near death in a Nazi concentration camp, he occasionally would call out in one of the 12 or 13 languages he had learned. In his deteriorated state, he couldn't be sure whether he heard responses.

One day, the young man thought he heard voices answering him in English, "and it was real," Mrs. Schonberger said. The voices belonged to American soldiers, who plucked him from the dying bodies. He went on to work for American intelligence in Europe, living in France and Israel before moving to Canada. That man, who had lost many of his own relatives to the Nazis, was Mrs. Schonberger's father-in-law. Her own parents were also Holocaust survivors, she said.

"We remember," the Rev. James Haddix said after listening to these stories, "because hope lives when people remember."

Haddix told of a series of sermons on tolerance given by one of his predecessors at All Souls, the Rev. Arlan Baillie. In 1946, Haddix said, not much progress was made in tolerance regarding business opportunities, social clubs and unrestricted housing. Those things took time.

Even now, Haddix said, the problems are not over. Hate crimes are reported in Maine every year.

"We remember because hope lives when people remember."

— Rev. James Haddix

Observing that so much of criminal activity occurs among young people has led Haddix to propose efforts to promote tolerance in that age group especially. He suggested that Beth Israel and All Souls cooperate to help public schools acquire curriculum materials that would encourage religious and cultural tolerance.

He also proposed that the two congregations discuss holding a joint baccalaureate service for graduates in the spring.

One service would be too short a time to comprehend the deaths of millions. The graduates could, however, hear survivors' stories from Susan Schonberger and Evelyn Trotzky. They could see that Maine has its own Celia Segal and numerous other Holocaust survivors.

Perhaps the graduates would hear the choir from All Souls Church sing the haunting Hebrew melody:

*By the waters,
The waters of Babylon.
We sat down and wept,
And wept, and wept.
We remember, we remember,
We remember — Zion.*

Rabbi Schonberger might tell them about the prayer that Jewish fathers recite for their children on the eve of every Sabbath. "Humanity and love must be shared," he said, "else they perish."

BANGOR — With such hopes must Alzbeta Broderova have boarded the St. Louis back in 1939. The young Czechoslovakian Jew was not only escaping Nazi Europe, but was looking forward to being reunited eventually with her future husband, Hellmut Lewin.

Not in 1939. The ship, with its 900 Jewish refugees, arrived in Cuba, only to be denied entrance. Living out "The Voyage of the Damned," the passengers sobbed and waved frantically to loved ones on shore, perhaps catching not so much as a glimpse of relative or fiancé. Jewish and gentile hearts alike broke as Evelyn Trotzky told this story Sunday evening in Bangor. The tale was part of the community observance of Yom HaShoah, remembering the Holocaust, sponsored by Congregation Beth Israel and All Souls Congregational Church.

The ship turned away from Cuba and went on to Florida, Trotzky explained. With anti-Semitic feeling high in the United States, the St. Louis found no haven there, either. "It chugged back to Germany," Trotzky said.

Not knowing whether she would ever see her fiancé again, young Alzbeta spent the war years in London. Eventually, she did reach North America again, landing first
